Frankly, we are disappointed.

Not just because you don't want to give BBS access, but because this was first discussed on 1st November. Jason also committed to providing access to the BBS Project Director on the 8th November (access to be arranged on that day). You also personally committed to getting it sorted last Wednesday.

In summary, it's taken three weeks to say no.

Yes, we should meet tomorrow am.

Matthew

If we could meet Wednesday morning Matthew I am sure that would be helpful

The other point to make here is that it should have been clear to BBS from the previous due diligence period through the competitive period that we had detailed information available on our systems. It would have been very much more helpful if they had identified their needs at that point rather than long after the event. Last minute requests now, which as I say appear reasonable but should have been discussed long ago in reality, are particularly disruptive and potentially result in attention being diverted from the main objective of reviewing the BBS offer against the ITT

There is a lot more to this than meets the eye. I am in discussion with David Crawley on the subject. In summary unfettered access to Hummingbird is not an option and nor should it be required. This is also to protect tie as there is a lot of commercially sensitive info on the system to which BBS should not have access.

We are working hard to provide design information as requested but I feel that BBS is clouding the issue with apparently reasonable requests which may be appropriate for a design build contract but are peripheral to the objective of price certainty for the Infracore contract under the circumstances envisaged by the business case. Price certainty here can be improved by focusing on design completion although perhaps the key focus now should be closer interrogation of the BBS offer especially in light of the potential change to Employer Requirements

Steve,

Please can you advise why the hold up? This is getting embarrassing for everyone.
